A new day has dawned, welcome to it. Today is Wednesday in Holy Week, and we continue our journey to the Cross of Jesus Christ in two more days. Today is also Western Wednesday in this little corner of the world, and today's song will not disappoint lovers of Country music. The remainder of this week grows darker and more solemn as we get closer to Good Friday. Today is the final day that we typically have no cause to gather for worship. That changes tomorrow as we worship to celebrate the last supper and the institution of Holy Communion. Then it all goes sour, as Jesus is betrayed and denied by His own disciples. And it gets worse after that. The Lamb of God will go silently to His death on the Cross, but not before a vicious attack by the Roman guards who were tasked with His care. Along the way there is sham trial where He will be convicted of crimes that He never committed. By Sunday we will all have a great understanding of why He allowed this to happen. For now I'll just leave you on this day with the idea that had He not suffered all of this, then we would be spending eternity in Hell. The truth will set us free. Our Western Wednesday song is from Marty Robbins, and it is called "The Master's Call." God's numerous blessings to you and yours today.
