Good morning to you on this western Wednesday, I pray that you slept well. Light shows on two consecutive nights, two great nights of sleep for me. The rain continues but the thunderstorms have ended. They started around 1:15 AM but I couldn't tell you when they finished as they put me right to sleep. The rain can stop anytime now, we've had enough of that. Check your basements and sump pumps before you leave the house today. Storms can be both soothing and frightening, and the storms in our lives are frequently like that. We can be cruising along in life with little or no trouble, and things can change in a heartbeat. We go from good to bad, or from soothing to frightening in a short leap. And we'll try to fight our way out of whatever the trouble is, but we'll probably just make things worse. Once we place these terrible situations into the hands of God, then we have peace, then we find healing. No matter what storms are beating down on you, take them to the Lord, no one is as qualified to help as He is. I pray for blessings to come to you in great measure today, God is with you. Our western Wednesday song is sung by Johnny Cash, and it's an old one. Here is "Ghost Riders in the Sky." Be well my friends.
