How do you explain the idea that it was quiet last night with no thunder or lightning, yet I didn't sleep anywhere near as well as I did the past two nights with storms. It makes no sense to me. If I let out a weak snore it wakes me up, yet I sleep through thunder. And judging by your comments over the past two days, many of you do the same. Just one more question I'll have for God one day. Another question I'll have is why does it get over 80 degrees in the third week in September when the children are back in school? It looks like next week is going to be just like that. We're thankful that our preschool is air conditioned now, but most schools are not. I have to be totally truthful, if these temperatures come in January or February, I will have no complaints whatsoever. This is our nature, to complain about the weather, either it's too cold and dry, or it's too hot and humid, we're never satisfied. But I am thankful that we don't suffer from hurricanes, tornadoes, earthquakes, or other natural disasters, this is truly God's country in Western New York. Yet, if a bad storm did come, we have the promise of a Savior, and He can calm any storm. Our song for this Thursday speaks of Jesus calming a storm, or storms, and it is called "Your Cries Have Awoken the Master" by His Mercies. Give it a good listen today, it speaks about you and me.
