

Saturday, October 2, 2021

Well, we made it to another weekend and I hope that you have an opportunity to rest and relax a little, or a lot. I'll be missing Graham's final soccer game this morning. We'll be saying goodbye to another wonderful sister-in-Christ at St. Paul today. Two hours after that I'll be officiating a young couple's wedding. We'll be saying goodbye and hello today. What a strange contrast, yet in some respects they are both causes for celebration. I know that our departed sister, who was a great believer, is now safely with the Lord, and we should always celebrate that. The greatest blessings actually appear when a believer arrives in God's Heavenly Kingdom. The ninety prior years that she lived were blessings that prepared her for the big one, and she now walks streets of gold with her Savior, and now resides in a Heavenly home prepared just for her. In this we should all be thankful, because He is right now preparing places for you and me. What a glorious day that will be. As this is secular Saturday here, I found an older song that I wanted to share, but it was recorded by two different bands, each successfully. So in the spirit of fair play, I'm going to play both songs, one by the Tremeloes, and the same song by the Four Seasons who originally wrote and recorded it. Here is "Silence is Golden."